

DEATH OF JNO. ALOYSIUS HOFF
MANN, BAY ST. LOUIS.

John Aloysius Hoffmann died at the residence of his parents, in Main street, at an early hour last night after an illness extending over a period of about two years. Contracting influenza recently, the end was hastened all the more.

"Lucius" Hoffmann, as he was fondly called by all who knew him, was a son of Emile Hugo Hoffmann and Catherine Ruisech, one of four children and the youngest son of the family. He was a native of Bay St Louis, aged 27 years. He attended St. Stanislaus College and in his early youth graduated from that institution with unusual honors. As a boy, as a youth and as a grown man he was universally liked for his clean life, Christian character and generous nature, and it is not extravagant to say there was not a more likeable young man in the community.

One who was always warmly welcomed and cheerfully greeted on every side. This was but a reflex of his own ever-radiating personality. Here was an exemplary Christian young man, one who had lived and practiced life as a virtue, and although his life was comparatively short-lived it will serve to that purpose that ennobles and will remain as a shining example.

Owing to the serious and critical illness of the father of the deceased, who is not aware of his son's demise, the remains were taken to the church of Our Lady of the Gulf this morning from which place the funeral took place at 10 o'clock, with a requiem Mass; interment at the family tomb In St Mary's Cemetery.

The family have the tenderest sympathy of the community in this hour when the shadow across the home has fallen so heavily.
